

AI Calling Agent Hand-Painted Ad Films

Three complete 32-second films for Veo 3, written in a hand-painted 2D animation idiom. Every prompt below is assembled and ready to paste — style, scene, camera, voiceover and audio in a single block per clip.

How these prompts work

Read this page once. It prevents the four mistakes that cost the most generation credits.

- 01 One block = one clip = eight seconds. Style, scene, camera, voiceover and audio are not separate fields. Each shaded block in this document is a single prompt. Paste it whole into Veo, generate, and you get one 8-second clip back.
- 02 A 32-second film is four separate generations. Run all four prompts, then stitch the clips end to end in your editor. Veo has no memory between them.
- 03 The style paragraph repeats in every prompt. It is not a setting you apply once. Each generation is blind to the others — remove the style text from clip 3 and clip 3 comes back photoreal.
- 04 Veo speaks the quoted line itself. You do not record or upload a voice. The text inside quotation marks becomes the audio.
- 05 Do not paste the headings. Labels like “Clip 2 of 4” are for you. Only the contents of the shaded block go into the prompt box.

Why the spoken lines are narration, not characters talking

Lip-syncing hand-painted 2D is exactly where Veo collapses into smeared mouths. Every character in these films is shown in profile, in silhouette or from behind, so no mouth ever has to carry a syllable — and voiceover over painted stillness is the native idiom of the archive films this style is drawn from. It is the safer choice and the better one.

Expect to regenerate

Hand-painted is the style Veo is least reliable at. Roughly one generation in three drifts toward digital gloss or smooth 3D shading. Budget three or four attempts per clip and keep the best — this is normal, not a prompt problem.

The style paragraph

Already embedded at the top of all twelve prompts in this document. It is reproduced here on its own so you can reuse it when you write new shots.

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation – characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

The closing negatives matter as much as the description. Without “no modern anime styling” Veo reaches for clean digital cel shading; without “no subtitles” it burns garbled text across the lower third.

Twenty to Seven

The missed-lead story told as a room rather than a complaint. The telephone carries the entire narrative. Best suited to realtors and property developers.

CLIP 1 OF 4 — THE EMPTY ROOM

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: A narrow Parisian apartment at dusk. Tall shuttered windows, sheer curtains breathing faintly. A black rotary telephone sits on a pale marble console beside a vase of dusty rose peonies. The room is empty. The telephone is ringing — the receiver trembles very slightly in its cradle, animated on twos.

CAMERA: Multiplane, slow lateral push from left to right; the foreground curtain edge drifts past at a different rate than the console and the painted wall behind, creating depth.

VOICEOVER, warm American female, unhurried, close and intimate: "At twenty to seven, someone decided they were ready. The room was empty."

AUDIO: A muffled vintage telephone bell, distant street below, a clock. Sparse solo piano, faded and slightly detuned. No modern scoring.

CLIP 2 OF 4 — TOO LATE

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: Morning. The same apartment, now in cool cream and faded blue light. A woman in a muted burgundy coat stands with her back to us, seen from behind, one hand resting on the silent telephone. Her shoulders lower once. Only the curtain and her coat hem move; she is otherwise still.

CAMERA: Very slow push in toward her shoulder, holding her face unseen.

VOICEOVER, warm American female, unhurried, close and intimate: "By morning they had chosen someone else. Someone who simply answered."

AUDIO: Faint traffic, a spoon against porcelain somewhere off-frame. Sparse solo piano continues. No modern scoring.

CLIP 3 OF 4 – THE VOICE ARRIVES

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation – characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: The same marble console and black rotary telephone, but the light has changed to a warm restrained gold falling in a long diagonal across the wall. The receiver is lifted and held mid-air, weightless, as though answered by the room itself. Soft concentric painted rings radiate from the earpiece in gouache, hand-inked and imperfect.

CAMERA: Slow gentle tracking move rightward along the wall, following the painted light.

VOICEOVER, warm American female, unhurried, close and intimate: "Now a voice stays in the room. It answers on the first ring, at any hour."

AUDIO: A single soft chime, warm room tone. Piano joined by one low sustained string. No modern scoring.

CLIP 4 OF 4 – RESOLUTION

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation – characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: Wide editorial composition. A woman in a muted burgundy coat sits in profile at a window seat, calm, a small notebook open on her knee, morning light across her face. Behind her, deep in the painted background, a black rotary telephone rests in its cradle on a marble console. She turns one page.

CAMERA: Almost still – an extremely subtle slow zoom out, revealing more of the painted room.

VOICEOVER, warm American female, unhurried, close and intimate: "It asks the right questions, books the visit, and brings you only the ones who matter."

AUDIO: A page turning, faint birdsong through glass. Piano resolves softly. No modern scoring.

The woman in clips 2 and 4 will not look like the same person — Veo cannot carry a character across separate generations. She is written turned away in clip 2 and in profile in clip 4 precisely so it does not matter. Do not burn credits chasing a match.

The Waiting Room

The same structure aimed at medical practices — a higher-ticket buyer, and an audience this aesthetic flatters far more than it flatters a realtor.

CLIP 1 OF 4 — TWO LINES RINGING

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: A softly lit waiting room in an old European building. Three empty chairs upholstered in faded blue, a tall window, a reception desk of dark wood. On the desk, two telephones ring at once — both receivers trembling faintly in their cradles, animated on twos. No one is behind the desk.

VOICEOVER, calm American male, measured and dry: "Two lines ringing. One desk. Two hands. Something always drops."

AUDIO: Overlapping muted telephone bells, a wall clock, faint corridor echo. A single sustained cello note. No modern scoring.

CLIP 2 OF 4 — THE COST

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: Close editorial composition. A hand-painted appointment ledger lies open on the dark wood desk, several lines left blank, ink slightly bled into the paper grain. Any writing is suggested by illegible marks only, never actual letters. A fountain pen rests unused beside it. Light falls across the page in a warm diagonal.

CAMERA: Very slow push in on the blank lines.

VOICEOVER, calm American male, measured and dry: "Every unanswered ring is a patient who called someone else instead."

AUDIO: Distant corridor footsteps, a door closing softly, room tone. The cello holds. No modern scoring.

CLIP 3 OF 4 – THE MECHANISM

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation – characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: The reception desk, now warm with restrained gold light. A graceful painted silhouette stands behind it – features unresolved, rendered in soft gouache shadow, elegant and still. One receiver is lifted. Soft hand-inked concentric rings radiate from it.

CAMERA: Gentle tracking move in from the left, multiplane – a foreground chair back passing at a different rate than the desk.

VOICEOVER, calm American male, measured and dry: "Now every call is answered on the first ring. Day, night, Sunday."

AUDIO: A soft chime, calmer room tone. Cello joined by quiet piano. No modern scoring.

CLIP 4 OF 4 – RESOLUTION

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation – characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: The same appointment ledger, now filled – lines of appointments suggested by illegible ink marks only, never actual letters, the paper warm and worn. A woman's hand in soft focus closes the cover. Behind, deep in the painted background, the faded blue waiting chairs are occupied by three seated silhouettes.

CAMERA: Slow zoom out to a balanced wide editorial frame.

VOICEOVER, calm American male, measured and dry: "It books the appointment, answers the same questions all day, and passes you a person only when one is needed."

AUDIO: The ledger closing, the quiet murmur of a full room. The score resolves. No modern scoring.

The Voice

The strongest of the three. A disembodied voice in an empty painted room is native to this idiom rather than fighting it — the reveal is the product demonstration.

CLIP 1 OF 4 — THE VOICE ALONE

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: Extreme close editorial composition. A black rotary telephone lies off its cradle on a wooden desk, the receiver resting on its side, painted in loving detail with visible brush texture. Shallow painted depth — the room behind dissolves into soft washes of cream and faded green.

CAMERA: Entirely still, except for the faintest frame-to-frame paint flicker.

DIALOGUE — a warm female American voice speaking from the receiver, compressed and telephone-thin: "Good afternoon — you asked about the property on Oak Street. Are you still looking?"

AUDIO: Telephone-line compression, faint static, deep room silence. No music at all in this shot.

CLIP 2 OF 4 — THE REVEAL

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: A man is revealed seated across the room in a low armchair, seen in three-quarter profile, wearing a soft charcoal sweater. He is not speaking. He watches the telephone on the desk with quiet amusement, one eyebrow raised — the only animation is a slow blink and the faintest shift of his shoulders.

CAMERA: Slow upward tilt from the desk to the armchair, multiplane — a foreground lamp passing at a different rate.

VOICEOVER, warm American female narration, clearly distinct in timbre from the telephone voice: "That was not a person. It made forty calls this morning."

AUDIO: Room tone, a distant street. A single piano note enters. No modern scoring.

CLIP 3 OF 4 — THE RECORD

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: Editorial overhead composition. Three hand-painted index cards lie on the desk in a neat row, each bearing illegible handwritten marks in faded ink — the suggestion of writing, never actual letters. A hand enters frame and adjusts one card a few millimetres.

CAMERA: Extremely slow push in, directly overhead.

VOICEOVER, warm American female: "Every call returns with a record, an outcome, and an appointment if the interest was real."

AUDIO: Card against wood, a quiet room. Piano and a low string. No modern scoring.

CLIP 4 OF 4 — RESOLUTION

Hand-crafted 2D animated film, entirely illustrated and painted by hand, in the idiom of mid-20th-century European and Japanese animation. Gouache and opaque watercolour on textured paper: visible brush strokes, dry-brush texture, paint buildup, imperfect hand-painted edges, natural pigment bleeding, heavy paper grain, subtle flicker and variation between frames. Traditional frame-by-frame limited animation — characters move sparingly and organically over fully painted static backgrounds. Palette: aged ivory paper, dusty rose, muted burgundy, faded blue, warm cream, soft green, restrained gold. Faded vintage pigment, no modern digital saturation. Soft painterly light, atmospheric shadow painted directly into the artwork. Elegant editorial composition, poetic and restrained. Absolutely no CGI, no 3D rendering, no vector art, no digital gloss, no modern anime styling, no photorealism, no lens flare. No subtitles, no captions, no on-screen text.

SCENE: Wide, elegant, almost still. The man now stands at a tall window in silhouette against warm restrained gold light, hands in pockets, the painted room stretching away behind him. A black rotary telephone rests properly in its cradle on the desk in the deep background.

CAMERA: A very subtle slow zoom out.

VOICEOVER, warm American female: "The calls are answered. You get the conversations worth having."

AUDIO: Faint street below, a curtain shifting. The score resolves and fades. No modern scoring.

The telephone voice in clip 1 and the narrator in clips 2 to 4 are different characters. If Veo returns the same timbre for both, the reveal has no punch — regenerate, or record the narration separately and mute Veo's.

Finishing the films

The price and the call to action go on an end card

“One hundred twenty dollars, ten cents a minute” spoken over a gouache painting breaks the spell completely. Generate the four clips clean, hold the final frame for about three seconds in your editor, and bring your logo, pricing and booking link up over it. Veo renders text as garbled shapes anyway — this constraint is doing you a favour.

Never let Veo paint legible writing

Wherever a ledger, index card, sign or screen appears, the prompts specify illegible marks rather than words. Any time you write a new shot containing written material, carry that instruction across — nonsense glyphs shatter the archival illusion faster than anything else.

Score it yourself

Veo’s native music defaults to generic cinematic pads that undo the period feel instantly. Every prompt here ends with “no modern scoring” to suppress it, but plan on laying solo piano or a small string ensemble under the finished cut.

TESTING

Spinning new variants

Hold clips 2 to 4 constant and swap only clip 1. The hook carries almost all of the performance, and changing one variable at a time is the only way you will know which one won.

HOOK ANGLE

OPENING IMAGE

The after-hours enquiry	A lit window seen from the street, one telephone ringing inside
The voicemail nobody returns	A message light blinking in a dark, empty office
The receptionist’s salary	An empty chair behind a desk, coat still on the back of it
The competitor who called first	Two identical telephones, one lifted, one still
The Saturday enquiry	Shuttered office, sunlight through slats, a telephone ringing
The forgotten lead	A calling card slipped under a door, gathering dust

A note on claims

There are deliberately no statistics anywhere in these scripts. Every claim is either your own pricing, which is verifiable, or a narrative anecdote. An opening line like “seventy-eight per cent of leads are never contacted” would be easy to write and is exactly the kind of figure you would have to substantiate under FTC rules on US traffic. If you want a statistic in the hook, take a real one from the Harvard Business Review speed-to-lead research and cite it on screen — do not let a model generate the number.
